In most of our daily life, we consciously plan how we talk to others and how we will deal with others. However, planning seems not being as effective as we think in our daily interaction with others. That is to say that plan in advance would not work. Why we think that? The reason is that we would suffer much more in the process of implementation, than in the plan itself. For example, you might set up a goal to "spend less money on meals out." And then suddenly you have a chance to order a one-dollar burger and 3-dollar fries. Or you might dream of a two-dollar dinner with your significant other. And then suddenly you see the lights of a city at night, your spouse comes home, and a bunch of children at the door. In any case, the process of implementation seems much harder and more taxing than the goal itself. Secondly, goals are based on opinions Despite people often use objectives, goals, and dreams as a source of motivation. However, they can only be set up according to specific preferences, and they can only be realized by us and others after a certain period of time. They cannot make someone reach your goal if you are not willing to or able to give what you need in exchange. As such, we do not reach goals, but we reach temporary states based on our desires. Accepting these factors, it is more productive for us to develop plans or strategies rather than setting goals. 3. Stay in place What is your daily routine? How many times do you wake up, eat, drink, go to the bathroom, work or other? We think that this is the normal way to live every day in our society. But it is not. If a person is constantly thinking about how to stay in place, they can easily master their current situation, which in turn create a sort of master
