An earlier study of a group of Gambian patients treated for uncomplicated malaria and admitted to the hospital reported that the parasite infecting them were of the same genotype as found in humans in the same area [1] (p.29). However, one patient in the current study had both *PK13*CAM and *PK13*K1 alleles. His infection was characterized by a short recrudescence period (8 days). In addition, the allele *PK13*K1 (just like *PK13*CAM) was seen in most genes of the parasite throughout the recrudescence period (Figure 5) (p.5) (ref-type="fig"). The link between parasite genotype and recrudescence in our study was indirect, namely, that recrudescence was more likely to occur in children infected by parasites harbouring the *PK13*CAM and *PK13*K1 alleles. For example, one child harbouring the two alleles underwent four recrudescences whereas another child harbouring the same alleles had only one recrudescence and two of the recrudescences (Table 4) (p.4) (ref-type="table"). Another child harbouring the *PK13*CAM allele had three recrudescences whereas the other children harbouring the *PK13*CAM allele had only one. This observation lends support to the hypothesis that children with the two alleles are more likely to recrudescence when compared with children with a single allele. The results of the present study suggest that allelic polymorphism of *PK13*may
